Most games feature some sort of story to explain who is in the world and what is happening. A common approach to this is to have player interactions with NPCs who can't respond, and instead have the player perform actions with the world itself. While this has the advantage of being'more real' and more flexible, it also means that players won't be able to click and interact in the world. This could result in a large role-playing-stylised menu or a massive advert-like interface with generic dialogue. What I'm wondering, is whether there's a way for the world/story to exist even when player characters can't see it, or whether I should design my world and story completely independent of the player. A: I highly recommend you Google "The World of Warcraft" for a good example of what you're looking to do (a large-scale MMORPG). They have a number of levels of interactivity that a player has while playing, ranging from the fascinating to the mundane. I don't know if there are any other games like this but I've heard a few references to certain 'open' games that are lacking a solid story to bring the player along. I agree with commentors who are saying that the'side view' effect is uninteresting to the player, but if you have a compelling story to tell on the other side, you're in a better position. Without wanting to dive too deep in the details, think about what it was like when you were walking through towns in the real world with a book in your 595f342e71
