What's new:

-Five," which, due to its writers and its themes, is a problematic text for a Canadian academic to teach. If we define Canadian literature narrowly as the written literature created in Canada, then much Canadian fiction falls outside our current boundaries, including much of the work of Böll. Indeed, Slaughterhouse-Five falls between the true 'cultural' and 'national' boundaries we might delineate in a scholarly article. Böll's film-making was influenced by the works of D.W. Griffith, and Sartre's existentialism was greatly influenced by the philosophies of Nietzsche and Kant. The two works of fiction I am describing in this article are the most successful works in American and European literary studies in the last few decades, which not only represent another category within the limits of a book on 'Canadian Literature,' but are works that also legitimately qualify as 'American' and 'European' in an academic setting. Slaughterhouse-Five was critically and popularly successful in America and Europe, but not in Canada where it was initially treated as a pariah text, and where, when it was finally 'read' (if that expression is appropriate), it was discarded by literary scholars as hack work. A Side of Life The short story and short film
