Basic.] | Download Activator Offline Installer Version 6.6.0.6 Full Version. Effects of electromagnetic radiation on the ocular lens, its ability to absorb and emit infrared radiation. The fractional spectral transmittance of the ocular lens increases with the absorbed photon energy. An increase in transmittance with photon energy is caused by alterations in the refractive index gradient and gradient in density of the lens and is termed the optical homogeneity. An increase in transmittance with photon energy is also caused by variations in the absorptance and emissivity. An increase in absorptance due to the homogeneous distribution of the dipoles responsible for the absorption and a decrease in emissivity due to dielectric relaxation contribute to the increase in the transmittance with photon energy. The effects of infrared radiation on human ocular lens are discussed in relation to optical homogeneity. Q: New borders around every
