Problem A HTML5 canvas control comes with a ton of drawing and setting classes. A lot of these are very similar so it's easy to reinvent the wheel. What we started with was a canvas element, and from there we tried different methods of drawing and setting colour, strokes, line-widths, etc., and this spread all over the place. The problem with HTML5 is that it lacks most things we want for things that are included in the other browser APIs. One example is a JavaScript object that takes multiple parameters to set a path shape, or a gradient. You can use CSS or the canvas to create shapes, but both lack giving you control over where the shape or gradient is drawn (on the canvas). HTML5 has the ability to generate a path in the canvas'
