The range of sizes and types of Australian artefacts: considering meanings in objects and projects, especially at the crossing of. 10. National Museum and Art Gallery of Canada.. NMC 2250. 218. Lomas 7-217.By Jay Edgerton Washington Post In a dramatic late-summer story, the U.S. Supreme Court on Thursday blocked the landmark clean-air law that would have given the Environmental Protection Agency new authority to regulate greenhouse gases. The court's action means that the pollution-limiting rules will be stalled until the next presidential administration decides whether and how they should be implemented. Thursday's decision will be seen, at least temporarily, as a win for the coal and oil industries, but green groups are certain to fight next year to preserve the regulations' provisions on greenhouse-gas emissions and speed implementation. The court's action could also have implications for decisions about how much access consumers have to information about renewable energy sources. The Supreme Court case grew out of a 2007 decision by the Bush administration to limit the EPA's power to impose controls on stationary sources of pollution by considering only current emissions when the pollution is first generated
