Young, busy, self-employed professionals are often given a second chance to start their families thanks to a generous maternity cover. But for those who delay pregnancy, often because they can't afford to stretch their finances, the Government has decided to hike the cost of that cover. One year from now a single woman who has had unprotected sex and stayed on the pill will have to pay £3,505 as maternity premiums will double. A single woman will now have to fork out £3,505 if she decides to get pregnant - however, if she waits until after she is married she can claim the tax break of £4,070. A 20-year-old mum-to-be may be up for the challenge - but will she be able to afford the hefty cost? Even with the generous maternity pay and employment rights, it is unclear how much these women will be earning. A new mother may have to fall back on her parents for child care, essential household tasks or even living off her partner while she goes back to work. Figures show that more and more women are trying to balance their career with motherhood. It is thought that in the past 10 years, the proportion of women who are in employment has risen from 40 to 59 per cent. But in the last three years, those who took time out to have children have seen their full-time job numbers shrink, from 50 per cent to around 43. And at the age of 30 a woman is more likely to be on maternity leave than on maternity pay. The number of 18 to 24-year-
