Evaluation of the potential effect of in vivo exposure to heavy metals from agricultural pesticides on the performance of mallard ducks. We examined whether exposure of mallards (Anas platyrhynchos) to residues of heavy metals originating from agricultural pesticides affected the absorption and excretion of various heavy metals. We performed 3 studies. In Study 1, mallards (n = 94) were exposed for 6 days to agricultural pesticide residues originating from the alkyl/aryl phosphate insecticide cyromazine (20 ppm). In Study 2, mallards (n = 48) were exposed for 15 days to agricultural pesticide residues originating from alkyl/aryl phosphate, organophosphate, and carbamate insecticide triclabendazole (100 ppm). In Study 3, mallards (n = 50) were exposed for 21 days to agricultural pesticide residues originating from 4 types of organophosphate insecticide. The water content of 1 organ in the liver, gallbladder, pancreas, and kidney was significantly decreased in Study 1. Exposure to alkyl/aryl phosphates in Study 2 did not affect the water content of any organ. Water content of the gallbladder, pancreas, and kidneys significantly decreased in Study 3. The plasma activities of acid phosphatase were increased in all 3 studies. However, the plasma concentration of manganese was increased only in the 3-week exposure group of Study 3. Our results suggest that exposure to some agricultural pesticides may affect the absorption and excretion of heavy metals and some enzymatic activities in vivo. { "TypeName": "Spell", "Skin": "engine/skins/spell.json", "Slots": [ { "Name": "duration", "Type": "math/context" } ], "Properties": [ { "Name": "duration", "Type": "duration" } ], "AnimatedProperties": [ { "Name": "animation",
