Other than the Content Aware Fill - which is going to save tons of time for retouching text, moreover - all the toolbars have been redesigned to modernize and improve how you work. Every button has been rethought to help give you more options, and to simplify choices. Then there's this great new feature that enables you to switch between Artboards. State-of-the-art artboards create a 2x2 grid of artboards instead of 4x4, keeping content on all sides of the artboards. While this feels pretty much like Photoshop, the new features aside, the biggest surprise to me was getting the exact same story processing service with the same settings (under the hood) provided to me both for iOS and for Android. So what can we say about it? Well, Photoshop now has a new interface with a new set of functions that you can perform with almost just a single click. It's more user-friendly and we can find it hard to dismiss the interface. They did a good job. I liked it! What is Photoshop? The initial idea of running Photoshop in the browser was to avoid installing the software and to make it more accessible to everyone. To do this, Adobe had to develop a web version of Photoshop that would be efficient and applicable to today's web. The first proof of concept was a demo that Adobe showed at the 2011 Web Summit. It was an application that would show photos from the camera roll in a beautiful way. However, at the time, it was not exactly what Photoshop was meant to be. So Adobe started developing a software that would more closely mimic the features in Photoshop. In 2015, Adobe released Photoshop for Web to Adobe's Creative Cloud users to test. As time passed, the scope and features expanded, and the product was released to the public. In order to bring Photoshop to the web, Adobe had to port it to the WebAssembly standard. WebAssembly is an open standard that brought a lot of power to web applications. It was originally developed to bring more speed to browser development. At the time, WebAssembly was a more limited format compared to other standards. It didn't have built in support for WebGL or WebRTC. However, Adobe's new team of engineers did a great job of bringing new capabilities as they were needed. Another big factor that made Photoshop for Web possible was the ability to debug web pages with the JavaScript console. The ability to debug web pages was one of the few missing capabilities of WebAssembly. It was a blessing for developers as they didn't have to install their own development environment or open their browser's developer tools. Adobe set up a special version of the JavaScript console for Photoshop. e3d0a04c9c
