Overall, I believe Lightroom 6 should be at the top of my list of tools that artists and photographers need to check out this year. It makes the same mistakes as its predecessor, but a lot of progress has been made since version 5. If the iWork suite gets the same sort of attention, I would expect to see some amazing results in the next few years. After all, when Apple started on the desktop version of Keynote and Pages, the Powerpoint quality was not so great. The same is true for the Portable Document Format, or PDF. In the end, we want both of these desktop versions and a web based experience that gives us the same experience as a fully-featured product when we need it. Of course that doesn't mean everyone should use the same tools as the pros. That might be way too much overhead for everyone. But if you're willing to take the required investment in your own workflow, Lightroom and Photography in general offer some very powerful features, in my opinion. Very powerful indeed.

The iPad Pro has come a long way since it first came out. And Adobe is now ready to take advantage of the newest version of Apple's tablets to create amazing and innovative works of art in a whole new medium. Not to mention the fact that it is both easy-to-use and incredibly versatile. What if what you use to make pictures shouldn't just get in your way? How many of us have an app on our desktop that compresses photos and spits out a RAW file, but can't output a JPEG? Adobe is a company that needs to satisfy a broad audience. They need to keep older versions around so customers can hold onto them for a few more years. That means providing stability and backward compatibility. With the new camera RAW for Photoshop Elements, users can choose what features make the cut and what does not. With Adobe's latest ad, they're making the old-school software now work on the iPad. But it's not the same Adobe that used to be.
